

Contents

1	Introduction	1
2	Financial Power and the Developmental State	7
2.1	Conceptualizing the Developmental State	7
2.2	China as a Developmental State?	12
2.3	A Typology of Financial Power	15
2.3.1	Conceptualizing Financial Power	15
2.3.2	Relational, Structural and Institutional Financial Power	16
2.3.3	Manipulative and Non-manipulative Financial Power	18
2.3.4	Objectives of Financial Power	19
2.3.5	Summary: Types of Financial Power	20
2.3.6	Relational Financial Power	20
2.3.7	Institutional Financial Power	21
2.3.8	Structural Financial Power	22
2.4	Preview of the Argument	25
3	Financial Repression and Structural Financial Power	27
3.1	Liberalizing Japan's Financial Markets	28
3.1.1	The Political Economy of Japan's Postwar Financial System	28
3.1.2	The Impact of the Growing Government Deficit	29
3.1.3	Structural Changes and Foreign Pressure to Liberalize	31
3.2	The Political Economy of China's Financial System	34
3.2.1	Turning Shanghai into an International Financial Center	34
3.2.2	China's System of Financial Repression	37
3.2.3	China's Bond Markets	41
3.2.4	China's Equity Markets	44
3.2.5	China's Approach to Capital Controls	46
3.2.6	Financial Repression and Structural Financial Power	50
3.3	Financial Repression and Liberalization Pressures	52

4	Financial Repression and Currency Internationalization	55
4.1	Determinants of Currency Internationalization	56
4.1.1	Aspects of Currency Internationalization	56
4.1.2	Economic Determinants of Currency Internationalization . . .	56
4.1.3	Political Determinants of Currency Internationalization . . .	57
4.1.4	Internationalization of 'Negotiated Currencies'	58
4.2	Japan's Failure to Internationalize the Yen	59
4.2.1	Foreign Exchange Controls in the Early Postwar Years . . .	60
4.2.2	The Effects of the Yen-Dollar Agreement	60
4.2.3	Currency Internationalization in the Wake of the Plaza Agreement	62
4.2.4	Changing Attitudes Following the Asian Financial Crisis . . .	63
4.3	China's Approach to Currency Internationalization	65
4.3.1	China's Criticism of US 'Monetary Hegemony'	65
4.3.2	Motives for the Internationalization of the Renminbi	67
4.3.3	Assessing the Renminbi's Potential to Internationalize	69
4.3.4	Policy Measures Promoting the Renminbi's Internationalization	74
4.3.5	Experimenting with Controlled Currency Internationalization	77
4.4	Wholesale Rejection Versus Controlled Internationalization	78
5	Financial Repression and Relational Financial Power	81
5.1	Japan as a Creditor	82
5.1.1	Japan's Emergence as a Creditor	82
5.1.2	State Control over Japan's Capital Flows	84
5.1.3	Japan's Vulnerability to Its Major Debtor	84
5.2	Investing China's Foreign Exchange Reserves	85
5.2.1	Functions of Foreign Exchange Reserves	86
5.2.2	China's Foreign Exchange Reserves	88
5.2.3	Debating China's Creditor Status	90
5.2.4	Investment Agencies	93
5.2.5	China's Relational Financial Power	98
5.3	Financial Repression and the Power of Creditors	104
6	Developmental States in the Bretton Woods Institutions	107
6.1	Structures of Power in the IMF and the World Bank	108
6.1.1	Voting Shares	108
6.1.2	Provision of Funds	110
6.1.3	Staff and Management	111
6.2	Japan's Challenge to the Washington Consensus	112
6.2.1	Fighting for a Larger Voting Share	112
6.2.2	Challenging the World Bank	114
6.2.3	Japan's Asian Monetary Fund Proposal	118

6.3 China on the Rise in the Bretton Woods Institutions?	119
6.3.1 China's Voting Power in the Bretton Woods Institutions . . .	119
6.3.2 China's Financial Contributions to the Bretton Woods Institutions	123
6.3.3 China's Representation Among Staff and Management . . .	126
6.3.4 A Beijing Consensus?	129
6.4 Financial Repression and Institutional Financial Power	132
7 Conclusion	135
Interviews	139
References	141

China in Global Finance

Domestic Financial Repression and International Financial Power

Heep, S.

2014, XVI, 157 p. 17 illus., Hardcover

ISBN: 978-3-319-02465-3